Who can marry? Youth and consanguinity are the two chief bars to marriage. Until recently, the age of majority was twenty-one and it is not until majority that a person has an unfettered right to marry. The Family Law Reform Act 1969 has lowered the age of majority to eighteen and the position is now as follows. If either party is under sixteen, there can be no marriage: if a ceremony is performed, it is not valid, and the whole process is void ab initio – as if there had never been any marriage, as far as the law is concerned. If one of the parties is sixteen or over, but under eighteen, any marriage performed will be valid, though the consent of both parents (or the parent who has custody if they are divorced) must be obtained before the marriage is solemnized. The consent need not be given in any particular form, indeed in the absence of positive dissent it will be implied. If the rules relating to affinity and age are complied with, and all the formalities are in order, the marriage will not be void, but it may be voidable. A marriage entered into without due consent or under duress or mistake as to identity will be voidable; and if a man is so drunk at the ceremony as not to know what he is doing, there can be no consent and therefore, the marriage will be voidable.
